Controversy at the male-only University Club

Daily Reporter - If I were to go upstairs now, what would you do?

University Club Manager - We wouldn't let you. We'd stop you.

Daily Reporter - Why?

University Club Manager - For obvious reasons.

by Fatima Jaffer and Jennifer August

Perhaps in the 16th or 17th century, the reasons would be obvious, but in 1987, it's difficult to imagine why this Daily reporter wouldn't be allowed into the University Club on Mansfield Street. The reason is that she is a woman.

Since it was founded by McGill in 1907, the University Club has excluded women from club membership. Yet it is only during the past year that the policy has received any significant public criticism.

In 1970, due to financial difficulties, the all-male organization granted the University Women's Club (UWC) partial access to the premises. For a yearly fee of $35,000, women were allowed into the building, but were still denied access to the grand staircase, the second floor, and the billiards room.

But recently the Club asked the UWC to leave, sparking an extended controversy amongst its members.

"At a certain point, the University Club became financially solvent, and took a decision to annul the membership of the affiliation with the women's club," said Professor Sam Noumoff, a member of the McGill Senate Committee on membership. Most assumed that it would pass without significant opposition, but the vote of 69-50 did not carry the required two thirds majority.

According to sources within the University Club, President Stuart H. Cobbett, a McGill graduate, was among those who campaigned and voted against opening membership to women.

"The people that were opposed to a change did a lot of ground-work and emptied out the old age homes to drag whoever was still breathing from the neanderthal generation to appear. The other side that was promoting the change felt the issue was so self-evident that it couldn't possibly lose, so they assumed rather than worked, and they lost," said Noumoff.

Many McGill professors were frustrated by the decision, and at the final sitting of Senate in the last academic year, the University took several actions to distance itself from the Club.

Although the University Club ceased to be an official McGill organization in 1923, when the current McGill Faculty Club was created, the University still paid the membership fees of several of its top administrators.

At the end of last year, McGill decided to end payment of these fees, and to stop holding McGill prepared to hold meetings and to pay the fees of people who are senior McGill administrators as long as the Club maintains a policy of gender discrimination. The answer was categorically no."

The Senate motion, however, was challenged when it came up for ratification at the following Board of Governors meeting. Despite the efforts of one Governor who moved the meeting into closed session to protest, the motion passed.

Some McGill professors who held private membership in the club were disillusioned with the recent policy decision, and decided to withdraw.

Dr. Creuss, Dean of Medicine, joined the Club in 1970, but intends to withdraw. "I joined back in the 60's sometime, and I guess it never occurred to me (that there was discrimination)."

"Many of us wrote disturbed letters saying we're not going to participate if there are no women. And since that time, I haven't set foot in the place.

Most of the university members decided to stay on though. I think we have to actively resign. I don't intend to just let my fees run out. I intend to actively resign."

The University Women's Club was also angered by the decision. According to President Leslie Forrester, "Initially when the Club came, asking the women to join, they came cap in hand and said 'can you help us out?'"

"But it was not a landlord-tenant agreement. It was just called the 'Arrangement'. When they asked us to leave, there were no legal ties to break. We were nothing, we had no status. If they

Club has been stifled. Club management refuses to speak to the press, and employees contacted by the Daily asked not to be quoted for fear of losing their jobs.

More and more people are beginning to dissociate themselves from the organization. Pauline Jewitt, NDP External Affairs Critic, and the first woman president of a Canadian University (Simon Fraser) was asked to speak at the University

Although McGill does not maintain any official ties with the Club, it remains closely affiliated. Almost half of the Club's membership are McGill graduates, and at least 40 McGill faculty members presently belong to the organization.

Noumoff is highly critical of the role the University has played in lending the Club prestige and respectability. "It's a matter of what your principles are and what you feel a university tells the rest

"It's a matter of what you feel the university is telling the rest of the community by endorsing a place with a gender discrimination clause. In the absence of opposition, one can only assume endorsement."

Club by the UWC. She refused, because of the discriminatory policy and will instead be speaking at the Faculty Club.

Many of those who oppose the Club are concerned not only with its sexist policies but also with its elitism. According to a UWC member who asked to remain anonymous, "There is a $3000 initiation fee, and then a ritual. These men sit around and judge you. If they don't like you, or you're the wrong colour... I don't think I've ever seen a black man in the University Club. And they've only recently begun to admit French-Canadians. They want people who will add to the ambience of the Club."

"It was an old boys' network club in Montréal," said Noumoff. "And then it turned into a very fashionable club for the business and professional elite. Much of it was anglophone dominated."

But many members of the University Women's Club have been reluctant to 'rock the boat'. A group of men invited Forrester to make an application to the University Club for membership, in order to challenge the current policy. The UWC Board of Directors instructed her to decline.

Women are presently using Club facilities on a month-to-month basis, but are under a great deal of pressure to leave. On September 21, the UWC will meet to decide whether they want to stay. At present, they have nowhere else to go.

of the community by endorsing such a place. The fact that McGill for X number of years has paid fees for members of the McGill community to be members of the Club, and to carry on McGill business there in the knowledge that there was a discrimination clause could do nothing but put the stamp of approval on that policy. In the absence of opposition one can only assume endorsement."

In 1984-85, the President of the University Club was McGill Secretary General David Bourke. He intends to remain a member of the Club, and said the issue of women's membership remains "an open question." He refused to comment on the criticisms which have been levelled against the organization.

Many people have criticized the McGill professors who intend to retain membership in the University Club. "The question of their resigning from the Club was rejected on the grounds that some of the McGill administrators are in the forefront of trying to change the policy, and to resign in protest and then deprive oneself of an opportunity to change the policy would be self-defeating. This was their logic," said Noumoff.

"The real test will be to see what will happen if they lose. They lost once. Let's see what happens if they lose again," he said.

Women. "They recruited enough members or they raised their fees or whatever."

Last May, a group of Club members proposed a bylaw change to allow women full events on the premises. Senate, composed mostly of academics, approved this unanimously.

Said Noumoff, "the Senate's consideration was a simple one, whether or not we should be were to open it to women though, the whole outlook of the Club would change. At the moment, it is a profit-oriented corporate club."

Intersection victim

by Andy Flynn
and Chris Lawson

A woman was hospitalized after being hit by a car while crossing Doctor Penfield at McTavish street on Friday. The intersection is used mainly by McGill staff and students.

Police would not release the name of the woman, who appeared to have suffered only minor injuries. The driver of the car would not give his name.

Friday's accident is the most recent of many, and the crosswalk has long been considered unsafe.

Neola Forrester, who witnessed the accident, said, "This intersection really pisses me off. Nobody slows down at all. They think it's an expressway or something, and it's been this way for a long time."

Students' Society has been concerned about the intersection for a long time, according to VP-External Chris Alexander. The Society commissioned a study into pedestrian safety at McGill in 1985 and adopted its recommendations as policy in March 1986.

Among the recommendations is a proposed traffic light to be placed at Penfield and McTavish, synchronized with the light at Peel and Penfield. Students' Society has asked local city councillor John Gardiner to have the light installed, but the city has been slow in responding.

Alexander told the Daily, "I think this is another example of the kind of tragedy that can happen when the right kind of action isn't taken."

Alexander pointed out that there are other hazardous intersections at McGill, notably the 'intersection' in front of the Currie gym. "They're both really pressing problems," he said.

McGill proposes students housing complex

by Kristina Stockwood

In an attempt to alleviate the growing student housing crisis, the McGill Administration is investigating the possibility of constructing a housing complex to lodge more than 200 students.

Devencore Realities, a Montréal firm, will be presenting a feasibility study to the University next week. The new housing would not be a residence, management would be sub-contracted to a third party.

The Administration is "reluctant to get involved themselves so they want to see someone else run a housing project," said VP-University affairs Maria Battaglia.

"There are no specific guidelines," said Director of Physical Resources, Sam Kingdon, "except low-cost one or two bedroom units that can house upwards of two hundred people."

"The contract states that if Devencore can't find a location close enough to campus, they can go ten minutes on the Métro East or West," said Physical Planning Officer Chuck Adler.

Battaglia questions the need for student housing that is not within walking distance of the campus. "It's too far - students want to feel a part of the McGill community. It will alienate them to live so far away."

Even if the complex is close to campus, they only "guarantee a certain percentage of rentals to students," she said. If a non-student is occupying an apartment, they cannot legally be asked to leave under Québec law.

Ironically, McGill has recently sold ghetto property from its portfolio. "I can't understand why McGill sold the building on Aylmer," said Battaglia. "It would have been grade A potential for a student co-op."

Students' Society established a housing task force over the summer "to explore a wide range of possibilities for student housing." They hope to define the scope of the student housing crisis and draft a report for Senate and Board of Governors.

The Devencore proposal is still in a primary stage, said Adler.

There is nothing definite yet. They will show us their proposal in the next couple of weeks."

"Right now, it's simply an investigation into the housing problem," he said. Devencore could conceivably come up with an unsuitable proposal. It could take several years before students are in these buildings.

"The university needs someone who would take on the risk of running the whole project," said Battaglia. If they can find an investor, they will "pay the difference of 30 per cent if enough students don't rent."

"The Board of Governors has a large deficit," said Adler, so rent will depend on "the going rate and what students are willing to pay. It's a financial balancing act."

"The housing sub-committee report looked at accommodations that would be self-financed for special students," said Battaglia, such as those who are handicapped or married. "It's a financially self-sustaining problem."

She said different students would likely rent each year, but they would have "the perpetual right to an option to renew."

In Ontario, premier David Peterson recently announced funding for up to 5,000 new University of Toronto residence places at a cost of about $65 million. Student leaders don't see this as a final solution for a housing crisis that is far more severe than in Montreal.

Voyeur loose in women's washroom

by Mike Slinger

A McGill employee was harassed by a 'peeping Tom' in the women's washroom in the Union Building basement last Wednesday afternoon.

"I went into the washroom and heard someone come in after me. At first there was silence, and then some small noises. I looked around and didn't see anyone at first, but then I looked underneath and saw a guy on his hands and knees. I went out to see the man's face. I saw a man running up the stairs but wasn't sure if it was him," she said.

The woman, who asked to remain anonymous, reported the incident to Students' Society and was referred to Security. She then filed a complaint with Security.

"We took the necessary steps," said Mr. Wright, the Assistant to the Director of Security. "The MUC Police were notified, and appropriate steps were taken."

This was not the first time such an incident has occurred. "Another similar incident happened in the McLennan Library washrooms, but we are not sure whether or not they are related," Wright said.

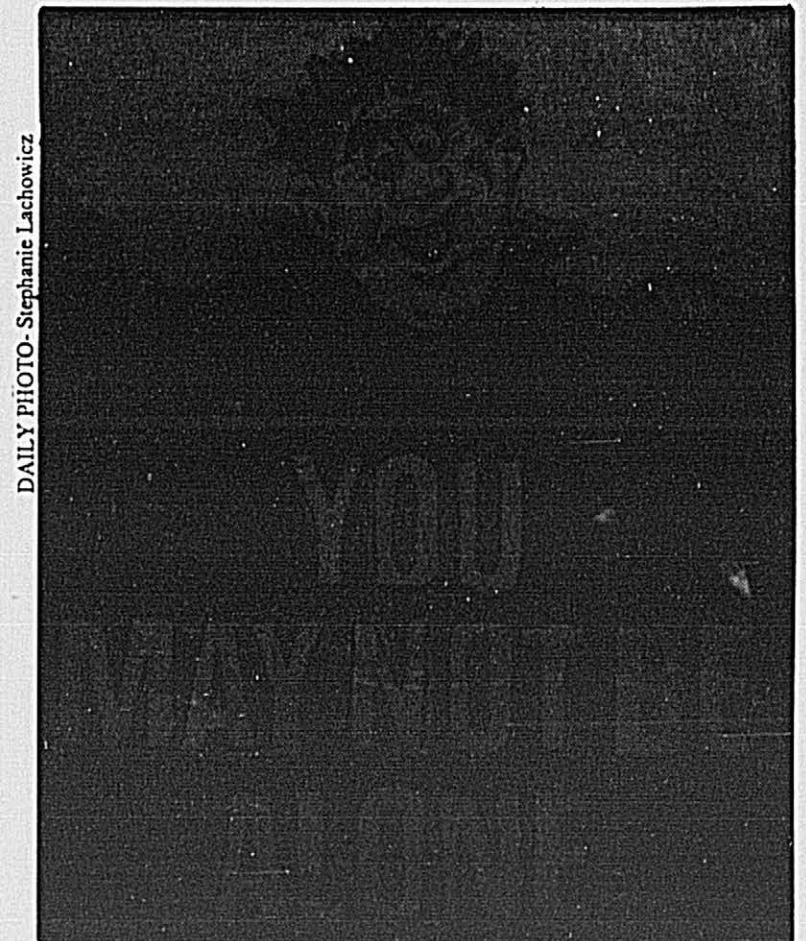

Wright advised women in this situation to "try to keep cool and get a good look at the guy, then immediately dial 398-3000 to report it."

Wayne Wood from Health and Safety said, "Often (offenders) are not from the university. Everyone should keep an eye out for suspicious occurrences. The security department can't patrol everywhere at all times so the whole university community has to work together to prevent these occurrences."

Debra Buczard, a member of the Safety Sub-Committee of the Senate Committee on Women, said, "We did undertake a survey about five years ago to examine safety on campus." The survey recommended less secluded washrooms has expressed any concern," she said.

"The problem is that people don't report these incidents to us," Buczard said. "I suspect there are a lot more cases. People can't be bothered to report to security be-such as those in the Bronfman building and the library, and additional street lamps.

In the five years since the survey, "There has been no major outcry, the committee has been completely inactive," Buczard said. "Nobody cause they realize that nothing will be done."

Buczard said that now that the problem has re-emerged, the safety committee will look into a better solution than the sticker campaign of five years ago that seemed to elicit little more than laughter.

COMMENT

No sympathy for the University Club

The practice of gender discrimination at the University Club is not particularly unusual in our society. Many taverns will not serve women, and there are numerous organizations and individuals actively discriminating against disadvantaged groups.

What is particularly disturbing about the case of the University Club is that the individuals associated with it are perhaps the most influential in our society. One would expect a certain level of enlightenment from those who have benefited from the class privilege of superior education.

The sexism of the University Club raises some hard questions. Why are the university and the business communities proving themselves to be among the most reactionary elements in our society? While most of society is moving, albeit slowly, towards sexual equality, it seems the University is swimming against the current. And this extends further than simple club membership. Only 16 per cent of McGill's academic staff is female, whereas the student population has been almost 50/50 for years. This can only be explained in terms of forces within the University acting against change.

One thing the University shares with the business community, however, is a highly centralized and anti-democratic structure. This, in part, is what allows cliques of out-moded thinkers to dominate not only our education system, but also the economic structure of society.

A critical re-assessment of the structure of these organizations is long overdue, for to continue along McGill's present course of slow and reluctant change not only spawns insensitivity towards the needs of minorities, it will also lead to the complete marginalization of this academic community.

FAE ad-hoc committee

Two McGill professors are helping the Canadian and American military build a better bomb.

Mechanical Engineering Professors J.E. Lee and R. Knystautas are under contract to Canada's Department of National Defence to research the dispersion, detonation and explosive power of a weapon called a Fuel Air Explosive (FAE).

FAE's were first tested as defoliants and anti-personnel weapons by the United States in Vietnam. A 1975 Times of London article, reporting the use of these weapons by the South Vietnamese Air Force, noted the particularly greusome death met by enemy troops: "The bodies bore no wounds, according to reports. The dead troops had their mouths wide open and had died clutching their throats as though gasping for breath."

A Fuel Air Explosive bomb is a gas which spreads evenly and completely over a target area and explodes when mixed with the proper proportion of air.

"Before ignition, the aerosol of fuel/air mixture will enter any space not hermetically closed, will creep into houses, seep into the ventilation system of fortifications will be sucked into the air intakes of engines and will settle in any depression the terrain offers." Victims located near the ignition point are obliterated while people at the fringe suffer burst tympanic membranes and crushed inner ear organs, severe concussions, pneumothorax, ruptured internal organs and blindness. (Jane's Defence Weekly, February 21, 1987).

The Stockholm International Peace Research Institute has condemned the development and deployment of FAEs not only because they are a cruel and inhumane weapon but also because their potential explosive power is equal to that of a nuclear weapon. Many experts warn that in bridging the critical "firebreak" between conventional and nuclear weaponry, "near nuclear" weapons like FAE's undermine policies of deterrence and make the escalation to nuclear war more likely.

FAE development and deployment has been hindered by problems in dispersing and detonating the bomb's fuel-air mixture. Interestingly, this is precisely the problem McGill professors Lee and Knystautas have been working on for the Department of National Defence since 1980. The Canadian government is sharing the product of this research with the governments of Norway, Great Britain and the United States.

The professors and the university administration have defended the FAE research contracts, presently totalling over $400,000, on the grounds that the research is merely contributing to the development of a mine-clearing system. But the history of the use of this weapon and the limited literature available on its potential applications emphasize the painfully obvious: FAEs are weapons of mass destruction.

The Ad Hoc Committee for Responsible Research, a group of concerned McGill students and faculty members, feels very strongly that the development of a better way of killing people and destroying property is an inappropriate use of the facilities and funding of an institution apparently dedicated to the advancement of learning. Many campus groups, including McGill students' Society, have joined the Ad Hoc committee in condemning FAE research at McGill.

On Thursday September 24th at 4:30 p.m. in room 410 of the Student Union Building, the Ad Hoc Committee for responsible research will be holding a public meeting to renew the campaign to end FAE research at McGill. All are invited. In the meantime, look for our information tables throughout the next week.

Job co-op

Ever toyed on a computer in Basic? Remember anything from that CEGEP Pascal course? Majoring in Computer Science or some related field? Then you can make your pocket money, (and the assumption is that you've got some pretty large pockets) by programming for staff members and grad students right here at McGill. The demand for students willing to take on programming projects large and small is tremendous. The problem is that the ones who need the programming services can't get in touch with the ones who can provide the programming services!

This semester, the "McGill Student Programmer's Job Co-op" will be created. The co-op will be a centre where McGill staff members and graduate students can announce their programming needs. The co-op will then take down the details of the programming job, post them on the bulletin board in the co-op office, and publish them in the co-op newsletter. If a student who is a member of the co-op sees a programming job they'd like to take on, they can ask the co-op president for the name and number of the employer, and make further inquiries.

Staff members who announce their programming needs through the co-op will be charged a fee, and this fee will go towards paying the co-op's expenses, and equipping the co-op with facilities which will allow the greatest number of students possible to take on programming jobs (for example, Macs, PC's, software, a programming consultant, etc.).

The student co-op membership drive is being held all this week, in the basement of Burnside Hall. If you have any programming skills at all, in any programming language, on any micro-computer, then you should definitely come and sign up to become a member of the co-op. The jobs are piling up already!

McGill plays musical libraries

by Gregor Allan

McGill is shuffling libraries again, and some students and faculty complain they are not being properly consulted.

The Botany and Genetics library will be moved into the Redpath building this year, and the Dentistry library was marked for closure during the summer.

"Unofficially, it's common knowledge within the Biology Department that the Botany and Genetics library is to be closed," said Biology professor Bruce Brandhorst.

Although the decision is not final, according to Brandhorst, "An ad hoc committee met and it is fairly clear the decision has been made to move the library to Redpath."

"Unfortunately, the university has not released a plan of what they apparently intend to do," he said.

"When the official announcement is made, there may be nothing that can be done."

This summer, McGill announced that the Dental Library was also to be closed.

Neither students nor the department had known that this decision was being considered, despite claims from administration that they had done so.

"The Dental Students' Society was upset at the lack of communication concerning this decision," VP University Affairs Maria Battaglia said.

Dr. Orsmy, Director of Libraries, and VP Academic Sam Freedman assured Battaglia that this lack of communication would be eliminated through regular meetings with her. She was thus surprised to hear of the decision, albeit unofficial, concerning the BotGen library.

"I'm upset that I don't know anything about this decision," she said. "It's almost like what happened with the Dental Library. As far as students go, they will have the opportunity to go to the library between classes if they move it to Redpath."

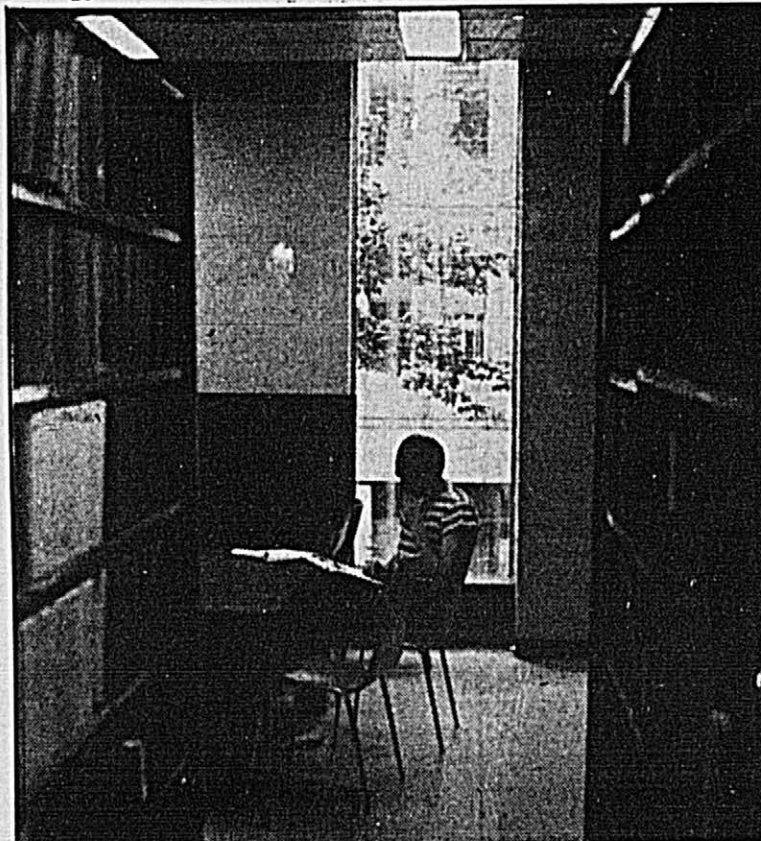

But according to the fourth year Biology student Rob Northey, moving the BotGen library from Stuart Bio would be very inconvenient.

"For one thing, it's a key source for undergrads, especially third and fourth students."

"If you throw all the Bio students into Redpath, it will become even more crowded than it already is," he said.

Brandhorst was also concerned. "It is important for people in my research field to have available to them a convenient source of material," he said.

Fourteen years for Pinochet

by Mike Gordon

A crowd of 300 demonstrated in front of the Chilean embassy last Friday evening, marking the 14th anniversary of the bloody coup which brought Augusto Pinochet to power.

"We hope to sensitize the public to the abuse of basic human rights that goes on every day in Chile," said Osvaldo Nunez, a coordinator of the Committee for Solidarity with Chile, an umbrella group of many Montréal-based Chilean groups.

The demonstrators were watched closely by about 20 police officers, including 15 helmeted riot police. The demonstration was allowed to remain in front of the building housing the embassy, 110 St. Catherine W. for about half an hour.

before marching down St. Catherine Street as far as Dominion Square where a short rally was held.

In August 1973, Salvador Allende became the first democratically elected leader of Chile. Following his entry into office, he announced a program to nationalize various industries, notably the phone company-- at the time the American-owned corporate giant AT&T. The United States government, under President Richard Nixon, started a campaign to bring down the Allende government, or at least moderate its policies. Eventually the CIA became involved, creating unrest and arming Pinochet's opposition forces. On September 11, 1973, Pinochet seized power. Allende was murdered, as were thousands of members of his government, supporters, and suspected supporters.

In the past 14 years, political and economic repression have changed the face of Chile. The Chilean army is still fighting a war against guerrilla organizations. Last year's Papal visit to the country set off weeks of religious rebellion against Pinochet's government, which ended with some of the most repressive anti-subversive measures in Chilean history. Also last year, the murder of an American youth visiting Chile and the related burning of a Chilean woman brought considerable attention to Pinochet's regime. The treatment of the woman's disfiguring burns in a Montréal hospital brought the situation in Chile closer to home.

to the Daily:

As concerned observers, we are dismayed at Canada's decision to oppose the resolution on the Palestinian problem put to a vote during the International Francophone summit in Québec. Canada cast the only vote against the resolution, which affirmed the Palestinian people's right to self-determination.

Canada's vote is particularly puzzling in view of the fact that the Canadian government has recently been a vocal opponent of apartheid and proponent of South African people's right to self-determination, going as far as to host Oliver Tambo, the head of the ANC, who spoke with the Prime Minister and the Minister of external affairs during this visit. How can the Canadian government rationalize denying the Palestinians what it would give to Black South Africans.

La Francophonie is largely a dictator's club of which Canada is one of the few members which is democratic and which respects human rights. Most member states can be accused justly of hypocrisy when affirming the rights of the Palestinians while they systematically deprive their own peoples of their fundamental rights.

Jon Smyth lives in Montréal. He occasionally goes to debates. This May he participated in a public presentation on the limits of civil disobedience.

Soon after this debate, Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) agents began 'interviewing' Jon's friends, asking about his ideas and others who might share them. They also wanted to know if he planned on travelling this summer, who he might stay with, and why.

"The kinds of questions asked were of such a personal and intimate nature that they lead me to believe that certainly my telephone and possibly my mail is under surveillance," said Jon.

There are lots of people like Jon, and there are lots of CSIS agents watching them. They are currently keeping tabs on over 30,000 people living in Canada.

In Jon's case, they showed a broad awareness of his contacts, both social and political, and also inquired about other contacts with diverse elements of the Canadian left: peace, women's, gay and lesbian movements, prison abolition, and left publishing.

According to the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act, the job of the CSIS is to collect, analyse and retain information "respecting activities that may, on reasonable grounds, be suspected of constituting threats to the security of Canada." These activities include espionage, sabotage, clandestine activities that are foreign-influenced, political violence and other unlawful acts intended to overthrow or destroy the Canadian government.

SIRC, the official watchdog of CSIS operations, consists of representatives chosen by the Prime Minister in consultation with the opposition party leaders. The committee prepares an annual report on the CSIS, and this year's assessment was not favourable.

The report estimates that the counter-subversion branch of the CSIS "probably has more than 30,000 files on individuals. How many more, no one knows."

The report found that the CSIS ignores questions of freedom and privacy when they decide to investigate. The review committee also revealed the CSIS practice of identifying friends and associates of people targeted for investigation and making them targets as well.

It also questioned the organization's efficiency. "The of expression. "We remain to be convinced that the group... should be targetted for investigation," said the report.

Soon after the SIRC report was released, Rick Salutin, the editor of This Magazine, learned that his Toronto-based publication was the one referred to in the report. Despite subsequent denials from both the CSIS and Solicitor-General James Kelleher, Salutin still believes his magazine was targetted for investigation. "Our source is a lot more reliable to us than a frenzied denial from the CSIS under fire," he said.

The CSIS never actually contradicted the report's findings with regard to This Magazine. Gerry Cummings, CSIS spokesperson, said the agency was investigating not the publication itself but a group of individuals associated with it.

Apart from a general critique of the CSIS's investigation policy, it also accused the CSIS of acting in support of US foreign policy rather than in defense of Canada's security.

One group was targetted for surveillance because of its "attack on the anti-communist, pro-U.S. government of El Salvador."

"We cannot agree that a non-violent attack on U.S. foreign policy is necessarily a threat to the security of Canada," said the committee report.

The committee added that the CSIS has shown no interest in investigating Canadian groups that are raising funds for the U.S.-backed Contras in Nicaragua, when such groups fall more clearly into the CSIS's mandate of monitoring activities supporting the use of violence against a foreign state.

On the other hand, a Canadian affirmative vote on the rights of the Palestinians would have been largely consistent with domestic Canadian political practice. Unfortunately, Canada chose to cast a negative vote instead, thereby being as hypocritical as the Francophone dictatorships; the dictatorships would grant the Palestinians rights they deny their own peoples, and Canada would deny the Palestinians rights it grants its own people.

External Affairs Minister, Joe Clark, said that Canada voted as it did so as not to "pre-judge the results of a conference on the future of the Palestinians." (Toronto Star, Sept.3). Canada's alignment with countries opposed to granting the Palestinians the right to self-determination constitutes a more serious case of 'pre-judgement' than that which Canada ostensibly seeks to avoid.

Every year, the students pay a fee that goes toward the building of an athletics complex on campus. The suggested site is on the mountain, by the existing facility of the Currie Gym. However, Montréal's municipal government doesn't want to develop the mountain's green space, leaving McGill without an athletics complex. Various students on campus gave their opinions on the issue.

The facilities now are minimal. This is a well-known university and it should have a decent athletics complex.

Anne Wiseman
B.A. U3

What exactly is happening with that?

I know there's a lot of money. The EUS told us there's not enough space to build. We're paying and I think if they don't start building soon they'll cancel the project. U de M has a good complex and here it looks worse than a CEGEP.

Susan York
B.Eng. U2

I think they should try to compromise. Instead of trying to build another complex, they should get rid of this one and renovate, or try to find another compromise.

Frederic Dickey
B.Eng. U2

Rye Symons
B.A. U3

I think they really need it and if that's just a mountain sitting there not being used for anything they should go ahead and use it.

Hani Ashkar
B.A. U1

They probably need more facilities by they definitely need to publicize those they have. I've been here for a week, and I want to go work out but I don't even know what they offer. In undergrad in the states it was obvious. They had signs and programs. The administration took a more active role.

Tom Jameson
Law1

It'd be nice to have a brand new facility because this one is kind of scummy. I don't know about right now being the time for it, with tuition fees going up, though. Then again, maybe we don't need it because McGill isn't such an athletic place.

Donna Doi
B.Comm. U3

Maybe we'd be a more athletic school if we had a spanking new athletic complex. And don't forget the downhill ski jump.

Fayz Khan
B.A. U2

We really need it. This gym isn't very well-equipped, especially compared to others, like Laval.

Janet Bailey
B.A. U3

I think building a new one is great, but I probably won't be here by the time we have it. I use the gym a lot though, so it doesn't really matter. Everybody can get use out of it if they want to.

Steve Boorne
B.A. U3

I remember coming here four years ago and touring the athletics complex. They told me there would be a new building in the next year or so. So far it doesn't look like there will ever be one. As far as I can see they have the money but not the land, even though the piece of parkland they want to use was originally donated to the City by McGill. The athletics complex is desperately needed.

Canadascan Prophylactics anonymous

VANCOUVER (CUP)—The University of British Columbia has launched a Vancouver condom delivery service, called Prophylactics Anonymous, to fight the AIDS crisis.

Using the advertising slogan "We'll meet your needs to see you live," Heather Stone says Prophylactics Anonymous is motivated not by profit, but by social responsibility.

"I know the projected statistics on AIDS and I really feel something has to be done," said Stone. "We're talking about life and death," she said.

Stone sells condoms at competitive prices and delivers within 24 hours.

The service does not provide immediate, spur-of-the-moment condoms, but concentrates on meeting the long-term needs of people who find a trip to the drugstore embarrassing or inconvenient.

Because the venture does not aim to make money, Stone said she will be able to provide condoms at a much lower rate than two other Vancouver delivery services.

Council prints sexist poster

SASKATOON (CUP)—A poster portraying a bound and gagged woman slipped by the University of Saskatchewan student council's policy banning sexist material on campus last month.

The poster, advertising the group Ransom, was approved by the council and produced by the council print shop.

"We were trying to decide whether it was sexist but it didn't have any sex implied in it. I thought it had been basically approved," said Print Shop Manager Tony Zuck. "That she was a hostage was what seemed important."

The print shop's constitution states "Any material considered to express or exploit racism, sexism, violence, hate or other infringements of basic human rights will be rejected."

Faculty strike conspiracy

HALIFAX (CUP)—Administrators at a Nova Scotia College want to keep their students in the dark about a possible faculty strike.

The Nova Scotia College of Art and Design (NSCAD) student council tried to send its members information on a salary dispute between professors and administrators over the summer, but college officials nixed the idea.

"It didn't seem appropriate," said Scott MacDougall, dean of academic affairs at NSCAD.

Administrators called the strike memorandum "too stressful" to include in an information package, said Margaret Boyle, president of the college student council.

A 20-day walkout last October by the faculty of NSCAD was the longest walkout ever held at an English speaking university in Canada.

Boyle charges officials are afraid enrollment will drop if news of a possible walkout is released. "(College president) Garry Kennedy said there wouldn't be half as much enrollment if there was a possibility of a strike. That's the reason they wouldn't want (the letter) sent," she said.

"It doesn't damage the students to know about the strike, it damages them not to know," she added.

Whites-only scholarship legal

TORONTO (CUP)—The terms of a university scholarship which awards funds only to white Protestants have been ruled valid by the Supreme Court of Ontario.

Judge William McKeown ruled in mid-August that the Leonard Foundation scholarship, which has dispensed about $15,000 a year since 1923 to students of "the white race," did not violate Ontario's Human Rights Code.

Further stipulations of the Leonard Will say that only 25 per cent of each year's money can go to women, and that no one "owing allegiance to a foreign government, prince, pope or potentate" can receive funding. It is a private scholarship, available to (some) students regardless of which university they attend.

Silvilyn Holt, Toronto region supervisor with the Ontario Human Rights Commission, said the commission will seek legal advice before making a decision to appeal the ruling.
